Directly this happens the dentine is attacked, the lime of the softer dentine is dissolved out, and fresh bacteria invade the dentine tubes. These peptonise or digest the gelatine after the lime is removed, thus forming a cavity, a process accompanied with more or less pain. If at this stage the tooth is treated--the softened tissue removed, with the bacteria, and a suitable filling inserted--it may be saved for years of useful work. If the tooth is left untreated, the bacteria continue their destructive operations until the pulp chamber is reached. The nerve is then exposed, with more or less acute pain, and the contents of the pulp chamber--nerve and blood-vessels--are gradually destroyed; and, by their decomposition, putrefactive material with bacteria accumulates in the...
