Excerpt from The Licensing Act of of 1904: With Notes and Explanations For the first time in British history a trade has been called upon to pay for the recompense of its members whose businesses are to be taken away, for, presumably, the public good, and the axiom that public benefits should be paid for by the public disappears. Before considering the Bill in its practical aspects upon the Trade, we will quote some public statements by leaders of men, as showing what their intentions, at least, were. The Lord Chancellor On The Bill. The Lord Chancellor, having remarked that a question of this kind should be considered independently of party, said that a noble earl who had just spoken seemed to assume that the question of temperance was always dealt with on one side only. The noble earl, by way of showing that this Bill ought to be rejected, had given them statistics of drunkenness, and had spoken of the property of brewers as being enormous. The Lord Chancellor said he could not help thinking that...
