ON THE EQUIVALENTS OF THE HAND AS AN ORGAN OF TOUCH. What we have already said respecting the human hand as an organ of touch, distinguished from what we term feeling, or a sensibility to agreeable or painful sensations, we shall not here repeat. We may, however, observe, that as this sense is not needed in great perfection by the lower orders, seeing that man only reasons, compares, and appreciates, so we must not expect to find it of extraordinary delicacy in whatever organ it may be seated among them, and in some it may be almost said to be absent. In the monkey and ape tribes, which approach the nearest to man in their general conformation--the interval, however, being very great--the sense of touch undoubtedly resides in the hands. We see these animals try the hardness of the shell of a...
