Not illustrated. 1919 Excerpt: .do not support any weight on the water, their only purpose being to act as bumpers in case a wing attempts to submerge. Wooden Construction. The wing float used on the H16 and F5-L flying boats is an excellent example of good construction, compactness and lightness, coupled with efficient design. A planview of it shows a streamline shape. This float, has the V-shaped bottom with a carefully rounded bow, Fig. 324. The longitudinal members and also the stern post are made of ash. These frames are of three kinds: The one in the middle with the solid diaphragm of veneer, or the watertight bulkhead; others that are rein Fio. 324.--Model H16 wing float. forced by lightened diaphragms of veneer, and still a larger number that are reinforced by veneer in the corners only. For the most part, this framework is fastened together with rivets. The sides are planked with three-ply waterproof birch veneer.The former practice of planking the bottom with two layers of cedar planking has been supplanted by the use of veneer similar to the side planking. A thinner layer of veneer covers the top of the float. All the joints susceptible to leakage are covered with sheet copper and a drain plug is placed in the bottom, near the bulkhead, at the lowest point, These floats are attached to the wing spars by means of strap hangers which are bolted to the floats at the panting beams. Another type of wing float in common...
